

STONEWALL JACKSON IN CAMPAIGN OF 1862

"The movement proposed by General Jackson will have to be postponed for reasons which have already communicated to him, and on which you will soon be apprised." The then handed me a letter to give to the general, and going on suggested that as I was going up in the morning I had better stop at Charlottesville and wait for orders there. Of course, I asked no questions, though naturally curious to know what would probably be the character of my orders, and why I was to wait for them at Charlottesville. But when I got there at noon the next day, I found the town in a fever of excitement, with a cordon of pickets posted around, preventing all egress from the place which was said that, at least, a dozen trains of empty cars had passed through some hours before to the Valley. I had, therefore, in difficulty in divining what was in the wind, and that "great events were on the gain."

Bound for the Chickahominy.
Presently the scream of an engine announced an approaching train, and as it came thundering toward the station I saw, as I expected, it was filled with troops, who not only fully occupied the interior of the cars, but like swarms of bees, and in fact, seemed to cover them. The train paused but a minute or two at the station. As it "glowed up" I recognized Jackson, who was seated in a postal car next to the tender, and as I approached him, said in his quick, sententious way, "Glad to see you, jump in" at the same time extending his hand to assist me in clambering up at the side door.

"Yes," I replied.
"Paper?"
"Yes."

"Then, sit down, please," said he, "and while I am alone, I will give you a note-book now lying before me. I copy the following memoranda as I then wrote them in it at Jackson's dictation. Give them to me, and I will forward them by which my army was transferred from the Valley to co-operate with the forces of General Lee in the famous 'seven days' battles around Richmond."

Extracts From Memoranda.
June 19, 1862—Memoranda—On reaching Gordonsville telegraph to Major Jones at Charlottesville (care of Mr. Howell) by the general's order. (Howell) the following dispatches, viz: 1. Telegraph General Robinson to send Second Regiment Cavalry, Colonel Mumford, to vicinity of Port Republic, and to return to and to reply when it will be there.

2. Telegraph Colonel Crutcher to forward a battery of artillery to General Lawton.

3. At once the corps of signal men under Vermilion, selecting six to ten additional men. Have their flags made.

4. Tell Major Harmon to have eight additional battle flags for infantry made at once.

An answer above when received.

Further Memoranda.
After giving my personal attention to the foregoing instructions in Charlottesville, which detained me the night of the 20th, I returned the next day by the general's order to Gordonsville, where I received by telegraph from him at Fredericksburg the following additional instructions:

"June 21, Gordonsville. Mem: Tell Lawton's troops that come from Charlottesville this morning proceed to Louisa Courthouse."

"Send back empty trains to take up the Louisa troops that are marching on the way."

"At Louisa Courthouse let the cars carry up Lewis' troops and the empty cars for those troops of Howell that are yet marching."

Telegraph as trains arrive.

"Communicate with Colonel Jackson."

The method by which this important movement of Jackson's troops from the Valley was accomplished—as may be inferred, if not fully understood, from the foregoing—was by means of having his army stores, artillery and baggage forwarded by the burdened trains, and causing the whole of his line of march (which was chosen near the railroad) and take the hindmost brigades, they in a couple of hours, were carried the distance of a whole day's march, this was, by Saturday's forenoon, and Saturday afternoon, with his impedimenta, was transferred without difficulty or delay to Fredericksburg, and station on the Central Railroad, fifty miles from Richmond, where it rested on Sunday, and whence, on the following day, June 22, it took up its line of march across the country towards Ashland, on the Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad, within twelve miles of Richmond, arriving there on the evening of the 23d.

An English Lord's Opinion.
Meanwhile I received instructions to proceed to Louisa Courthouse and establish a line of communication from that place to Charlottesville, which I mention as an additional illustration of the general's foresight and sagacity in providing for possible contingencies. Although at first I saw no occasion for couriers between the two points in question, the necessity for them became abundantly apparent when I learned a few hours after the line was established that it had been surreptitiously cut by some secret enemy, and no reliance could be placed on them for the transmission of orders and intelligence.

On Monday morning, June 23, I rode on horseback Wednesday morning, June 25, I next morning reached Ashland, where I found General Lee and a substantial dinner, which was all the line and thickest of the fray. "It was impossible to keep him in the saddle."

Father Brannon was present at the surrender of Harper's Ferry, and actually took a fallen comrade's gun and fought in the Fredericksburg and Gettysburg battles.

Father Brannon, it has been said, but not proven, was the first Confederate to get into Harper's Ferry after the surrender of 11,000 Federal troops.

We all know that the Confederates were reaching quickly all scenes of danger and excitement, so I feel more than likely he scrambled in where man was more careful to follow. Boy-like, too, he went on at once to the front, and began to help himself to the delicacies and clothing the Northern soldiers always had in reserve. But Brannon also thought of his comrades, and especially of a young lieutenant friend who badly needed a pair of shoes. He was detected in his pilfering, and being absent from his company, was arrested. A. P. Hill, in command, thought it was a disgraceful deed, and he was sent to the rear, where he was kept under guard until he was sent back to his company.

As soon as possible, young Brannon again started for the front, and on June 26, he was again in the thick of the fighting. He was again captured, and was sent to the rear, where he was kept under guard until he was sent back to his company.

At Gettysburg young Brannon bore a heavy share in the fighting. He was again captured, and was sent to the rear, where he was kept under guard until he was sent back to his company.
